THE CLARK SCHOOL REUNION

It has been said that it is not good for us to live in retrospect. In one respect this may be true, but we realize that the years increase, we more deeply appreciate the abundant blessings that are the dreams of youth come true.

Reunions are not the accumulation of years alone, but the memories and experiences that inspire us to carry on with noble courage, and grow more serene, sympathetic and tolerant.

If one looked for sad faces at the cheerful gathering of the old teachers and scholars on August 13, their tears were forgotten in the joy of that happy day.

No word of "depression" was heard, and no sign of want or privation was seen in the beautiful dinner prepared by those of the energetic efforts of the Kimballs and Wardwells, a ground well cleared in a lovely grove of white birches, and the weather was perfect.

Many had travelled long distances to be present at this eventful occasion. Eugene Wardwell of Bridgeport, Conn., surprised and delighted even his own family by his sudden appearance. He has a personality, that like another that makes and keeps friends easily. Both these "Eugenes" are musicians of repute.

Fred Clark, the last of his family, was present and recalled many happy incidents of his school life. He spends his winters in Florida, which seems a second home to him.

Isaac Wardwell was one of the oldest scholars. In a letter from Albert Horr of Lovell, Mass., a former teacher, he said: "Isaac was always a good boy."

To this the writer can testify, for he was my pupil 1871-72. Others of my pupils were Mary Marston, now wife of Eugene Andrews, with her golden hair and shy little manner, and Edith (Abbott) Greenleaf, a lovely child with dark brown curls.

Many short speeches were made at this time. It was one said of those Jacob Lovejoy, who lived near, that he was out of his sphere. The answer was that Deacon Lovejoy had done the work among his associates at Hunt's Corner, that had his name immortal, and was blessed by all. And so these leaders at the Clark school will never be forgotten, they are in the place they are fitted to fill. They smile at their troubles and invariably think things might be worse.

They smile at their fate, captains of the soul. They absorb from the tumult of the world a splendid conception of life, and through the generations passed, they are guided and inspired by the sterling worth of their devoted fathers and mothers.

This day at the Clark Reunion is only the beginning; another is proposed for next year and all who were present voted the day one of happiness and success, and resolved to perpetuate its memory, and herald the next reunion.

"Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be,
The best of life, for which the First was made."

—Ellen Millett Davenport.
